AT THE VERY MOMENT OF THE BIG BANG'S BIRTH

During a lunch date with my old friend, Father Georges Lemaitre, at a quaint bistro near his office at the Catholic University of Louvain, I couldn't help but notice a change in him.

He seemed more reserved and contemplative than I recalled, perhaps reflecting the weight of his recent acceptance of a lecturing position. Initially, I dismissed his behavior as mere nerves and anxiety about taking on such a significant teaching role at a young age. However, he appeared somewhat detached, as if his mind was wandering far beyond our conversation, prompting me to jokingly remark that he seemed focused on the edge of the universe.

He responded with a faint smile and a slight shrug, acknowledging the situation, probably out of courtesy to the person treating him to lunch. Suddenly, he glanced up from his salad and muttered, "Damn that Alexander Friedmann!"

It caught me off guard, leaving me speechless since Friedmann was not a name typically mentioned during our casual lunch chats.

In a bid to respond, I simply echoed, "Damn that Friedmann!"

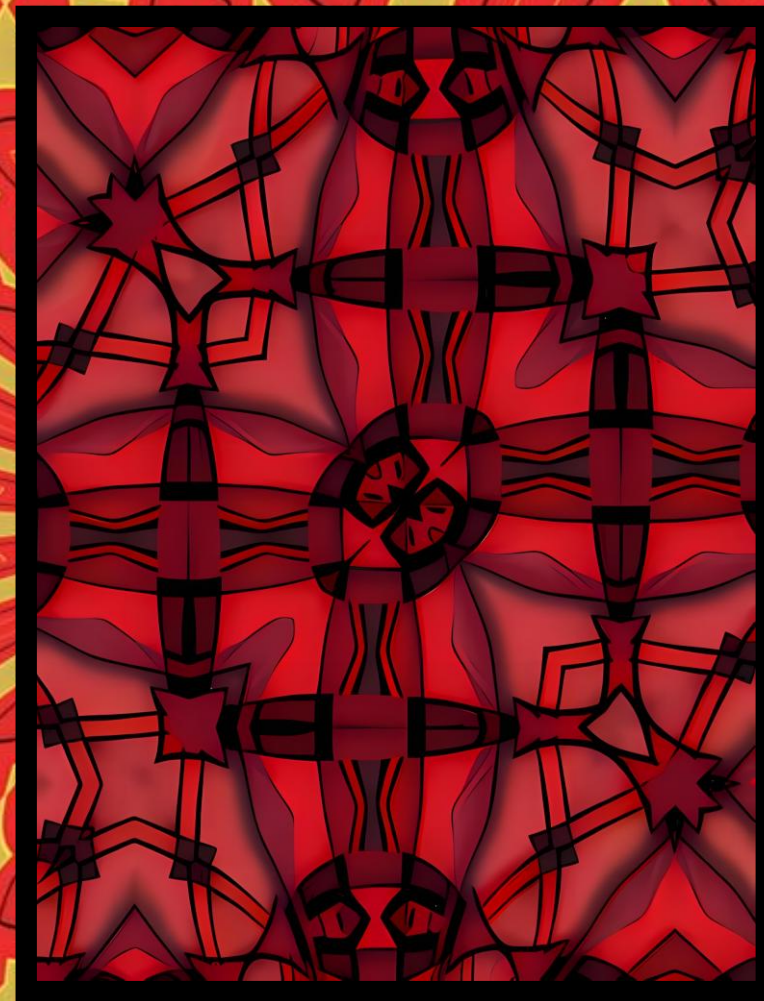

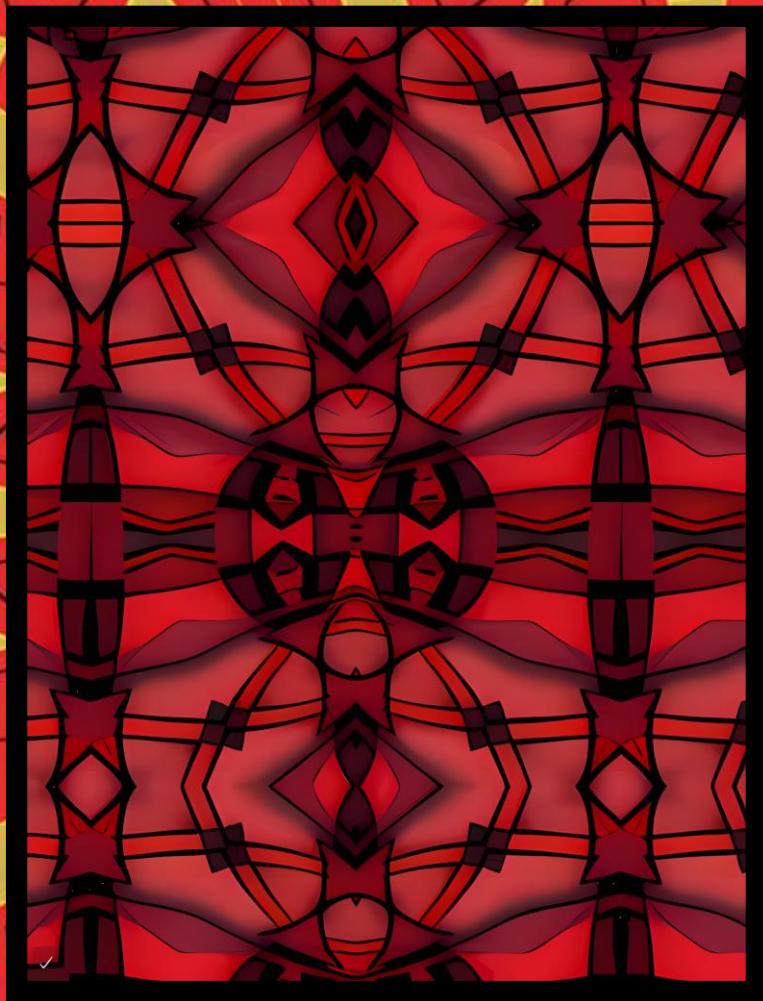

I would later discover that this Friedmann character was an ambitious Russian whom Father Lemaitre suspected of attempting to appropriate his years of research.

However, I soon learned that Mister Friedmann had already published the foundational mathematics that Father Lemaitre was currently employing to develop his groundbreaking theory on the universe's creation.

I once believed that the father's new theory was a positive development, as it challenged the Catholic Church's long-held views on the universe's creation. His perspective seemed to sideline God, unless one argued that God initiated the "Big Bang."

However, framing God as a sort of reckless creator, akin to a bomb-throwing arsonist who inadvertently sparked the universe into existence, felt absurd.

This event, according to scientists, occurred billions of years ago, yet many fundamentalist groups insist it happened just last Tuesday—though not this past Tuesday, as that was Bingo Night at the mission, and anyone familiar with the devoted, blue-haired ladies who attend knows that even divine intervention wouldn't disrupt their cherished game.

Unfortunately, the unfolding events of the following decades meant that my time with Father Lemaitre was limited to that one occasion, yet I continued to follow his remarkable journey.

This brings me to a key observation: I have been truly amazed by how he managed to persuade the Church Fathers that God could be equated with the Big Bang.

To avoid ruffling Protestant feathers, he referred to the universe as a singular primeval atom, subtly hinting at the divine.

He explained that the "Bang" was not a conventional explosion but rather an expansion of God's consciousness, which subsequently led to the complexities of space, the concept of time, and even the cultural phenomenon of "Star Trek" reruns.

Father Lemaitre skillfully navigated the complex questions surrounding the idea of a God-initiated "Big Bang," pondering whether it was merely a coincidence.

As someone who has studied the Industrial Revolution and possesses a curious mind—evidenced by my lifelong subscription to the National Enquirer—I propose that many of humanity's remarkable advancements have often emerged from serendipity or a desire to avoid effort.

A prime illustration of innovation can be found in the invention of crunchy peanut butter.

This delightful variation emerged when a night shift worker at a peanut butter factory dozed off before completing the grinding process for the traditional creamy style.

Initially, the factory owner considered terminating the worker for his apparent laziness, but everything changed when a colleague sampled the unfinished product and exclaimed, "It tastes great!"

This unexpected twist not only saved the worker's job but also introduced a beloved new flavor to the world.

If the Big Bang was indeed a chance occurrence, it could be argued that it shouldn't be viewed as a failure of divine oversight, especially since the universe has largely evolved positively from that event.

So much for my VH1 Movement of 15 minutes of fame that cost me only the price of a lunch in 1927.
